A total of 87 clinically diagnosed patients of leptospirosis were screened for the presence of spirochetes using darkfield microscopy. The study revealed the occurrence of spirochetes in 23 (26%) of 87. Of the 23 spirochetemic cases, only one was symptomatic and the rest had subclinical infection. A high incidence of spirochetes was seen in patients belonging to the age group of 21-30 years. The spirochetemic patients had a significantly higher number of febrile days than asymptomatic patients. Of the 87 patients screened, 7 (8%) were positive by culture; 6 were culture negative-microscopy positive; and 74 (85%) were culture negative-microscopy negative. Only three of the seven culture positive cases were spirochetemic. In conclusion, the present study demonstrates that blood cultures are of limited use for the diagnosis of leptospirosis.# Copyright (c) 2020 PaddlePaddle Authors.
